The Property

Positioned within the sought-after village of Alderley Edge, Tanyard Farm presents a carefully composed house with a strong architectural identity, supported by a generous landholding and a collection of well-considered ancillary buildings. The setting remains a defining feature, with far-reaching views across surrounding countryside, while the approach and arrangement of the buildings establish a sense of arrival that feels both private and intentional.

The house itself has been extended and reworked to create a sequence of spaces that respond directly to the landscape. From the entrance, the layout begins to open out, drawing you through towards the principal living areas where glazing and volume become more pronounced. The main sitting room is arranged to take full advantage of its connection to the garden, with wide expanses of glazing set within timber framing, allowing light to move through the space while maintaining a clear visual link to the outside. The proportions are generous without feeling over-scaled, and the detailing, including exposed structural elements and carefully integrated joinery, gives the room a sense of permanence.

This sense of openness continues into the adjoining living and dining spaces, where the architecture becomes more expressive. A vaulted ceiling with exposed beams introduces height, while rooflights and full-height glazing bring in consistent natural light throughout the day. Large sliding doors extend the space directly onto the terrace, allowing it to function as a natural continuation of the interior during warmer months. The arrangement is both practical and sociable, with clearly defined zones for seating and dining, while maintaining a cohesive flow.

The kitchen is positioned to anchor this part of the house, fitted with bespoke cabinetry by Tom Howley and a substantial central island finished with stone work surfaces. Integrated appliances are set within the main run, while a range cooker is framed by a traditional mantle, introducing a more grounded, functional element. A separate utility room, also by Tom Howley, provides additional storage and working space, ensuring the main kitchen remains uncluttered and efficient in day-to-day use.

More formal accommodation is provided by a separate dining room, where the use of vertical timber panelling introduces texture and contrast, creating a space that feels distinct from the more open-plan areas.

A particularly useful addition on the ground floor is a self-contained suite with its own independent access, arranged to include a bedroom, separate living room, currently fitted as a cinema room with bespoke media wall, and a kitchen, alongside a shower room. The layout offers a high degree of flexibility for extended family, guest accommodation or potential income, while remaining clearly distinct from the main house.

On the first floor, the bedroom accommodation is arranged with a clear emphasis on space and outlook. The principal suite is particularly well-proportioned, with a vaulted ceiling and exposed beams echoing the architectural language of the ground floor. Windows are positioned to frame views across the surrounding landscape, while fitted storage is integrated in a way that maintains the simplicity of the space. The en suite bathroom is finished with high-quality materials, including stone surfaces and a walk-in shower, creating a room that feels both considered and durable.

Further bedrooms are similarly well-sized, each with its own character defined by the roofline and window placement. Bathrooms across this level have been finished with a mix of contemporary fittings and more traditional detailing, providing a consistent level of finish throughout.

Beyond the main house, the outbuildings add a further layer of versatility. A detached garage with an attached gym is positioned to one side, providing both practical storage and a dedicated space for fitness, with direct access to the grounds. A separate timber-built structure offers additional accommodation, currently arranged as a games room with a mezzanine level, creating a space that can be adapted for leisure, guest use or home working depending on requirements. The space is further supported by a full bathroom with shower, enhancing its practicality for more independent or extended use. In addition, a detached home office provides a more private, self-contained working environment.

A stable block sits separately within the grounds, benefiting from its own access track from the road, and offers clear potential for alternative uses. Its position and independent access suggest scope for conversion to residential accommodation, subject to the necessary consents.

Externally

The grounds extend to approximately 16.83 acres in total, arranged as a combination of formal garden areas and open paddocks. Immediately around the house, terraces and seating areas are positioned to take advantage of the orientation, with direct access from the principal living spaces. A natural swimming pond has been carefully introduced as a focal point within the landscape, complete with a timber deck and surrounding planting, while a small bridge connects different sections of the garden, adding both character and practicality.

A sweeping driveway provides extensive parking and access to the garage and carport, ensuring both practicality and ease of arrival, while reinforcing the sense of space and privacy that defines the setting.
